NEW QUESTION: 2 Which of the following policies are considered as a good starting point while designing a wireless security policy document? Each correct answer represents a complete solution. Choose all that apply. A. Rogue AP policy B. Protocol policy C. Functional security policy D. General security policy
Answer: A, C, D
Explanation: The policies that are considered as a good starting point for designing a wireless security policy document are as follows: Functional security policy: A general security policy is defined first while establishing a wireless security policy. It establishes why wireless security is important for any organization. The general security policy defines the following items: Statement of authority: It defines who has put the wireless security policy. Applicable audience: It defines the audience such as employees, visitors, etc. to whom the policy applies. Violation reporting procedures: It defines the violation procedures for the wireless security policy. Risk assessment and threat analysis: It defines what financial impact will be on the company if any attack occurs to be successful. Security auditing: It defines the internal and external auditing procedures. Rogue AP policy: Rogue AP policy states that no end users has permission to install their own wireless devices on the corporate network. A wireless device includes access point, wireless routers, wireless cards, etc. This policy should be strictly enforced. General security policy: Functional security policy shows how the basic security services are addressed for each resource in the system. It defines the technical aspects of the wireless security and establishes how to secure the wireless network. Answer option C is incorrect. The protocol policy is not considered while designing a wireless security policy document.
