NEW QUESTION: 1Which two statements are true about the use of direct path loads when selecting from external tables in a database on a Database Machine?A. CREATE TABLE . . . AS SELECT statements, which select from external tables, attempt to use in direct path loading automatically.B. CREATE TABLE . . . AS SELECT statements, which select from external tables, require the APPEND hint to use direct path loading.C. INSERT INTO . . . SELECT FROM statements, executed serially, which select from external tables, are unable to use direct path loading. D. INSERT INTO . . . SELECT FROM statements, executed serially, which select from external tables, require the APPEND hint to use direct path loading. Answer: A, D Explanation: A CTAS (Create table as select) will always use direct path (B, not C) load but IAS (Insert as select) statement will not. In order to achieve direct path load with an IAS statement you must add the APPEND hint to the command (A, not D). Direct path loads can also run in parallel. You can set the parallel degree for a direct path load either by adding the PARALLEL hint to the CTAS or IAS statement or by setting the PARALLEL clause on both the external table and the table into which the data will be loaded. Once the parallel degree has been set at CTAS will automatically do direct path load in parallel but an IAS will not. In order to enable an IAS to do direct path load in parallel you must alter the session to enable parallel DML. Note: * Parallel Direct Path Load The key to good load performance is to use direct path loads wherever possible. A direct path load parses the input data according to the description given in the external table definition, converts the data for each input field to its corresponding Oracle data type, then builds a column array structure for the data. These column array structures are used to format Oracle data blocks and build index keys. The newly formatted database blocks are then written directly to the database, bypassing the standard SQL processing engine and the database buffer cache. NEW QUESTION: 2 A company is deploying smartphones for its mobile sales force. These devices are for personal and business use but are owned by the company. Sales personnel will save new customer data via a custom application developed for the company. This application will integrate with the contact information stored in the smartphones and will populate new customer records onto it. The customer application's data is encrypted at rest, and the application's connection to the back office system is considered secure. The Chief Information Security Officer (CISO) has concerns that customer contact information may be accidentally leaked due to the limited security capabilities of the devices and the planned controls. Which of the following will be the MOST efficient security control to implement to lower this risk? A. Restrict contact information storage dataflow so it is only shared with the customer application. B. Implement a mobile data loss agent on the devices to prevent any user manipulation with the contact information. C. Require complex passwords for authentication when accessing the contact information. D. Restrict screen capture features on the devices when using the custom application and the contact information. Answer: A
